Thursday, September 13, 2011 As the competition for space on the PC is more heated than ever, organizations are more likely to face problems related to disk space. The problem has been so serious that hard drives have become essential, not only for PCs but also for other crucial businesses, such as banking, payroll, healthcare, and insurance. Whether you need more space for your PC or you want to back up your main data, you need to consider the following ten tips for space saving. The hope is to help you make the best possible use of your hard drives and save money at the same time. Monitor If you are an IT professional, you might have been able to save space by using acronyms like I, A, and L, instead of actually filling the disk with data. In fact, people often use acronyms to represent people's name, rather than their full names, or use them simply as a joke. An example is the use of the I for Inventor, while others use the L for Leiter, Lee, and L. Those people's first initials became abbreviations for their last name and they would replace that with their own initials. Another one is the I for In Business, rather than IBM. However, if you are not an IT expert, you might be confused by these acronyms. Worse, you might even be tempted to do the same and use them for your personal use. The best bet is to monitor the space you are using on a regular basis. It will not only help you save space, but it will also show you the extent of your data. Use External Drives Not only do you need more space for your operating system and applications, but you also have to accommodate the data from your external drives. The best way to do so is to use external hard drives. The drawback is that these drives are much slower than your internal hard drive. So if you want to back up all the data and files for a
