Human serum albumin (HSA) has been proved as a tumor marker; a simple and sensitive method for HSA detection is of great importance for clinical diagnosis and treatment. In this study, we used the humanized Renilla reniformis glutathione S-transferase (rhGST) gene as a signal probe, in combination with 3 x TATA box and human nuclear factor 1 (NF-1) response element as the reporter genes, to construct a bioluminescence (BL) HSA detection system. Using this system, the dynamic range of the assay was 0.05-1.5 g x l(-1), the detection limit was 0.6 g x l(-1), and the coefficient of variation (CV) of the assay was 3.6% (n = 6). In addition, this method achieved both a high degree of accuracy and outstanding convenience. Importantly, we measured the contents of HSA in three pathological sera, and the results coincided with those obtained by the Jinzhong HSA assay and the single radial immunodiffusion assay. Furthermore, this method was successfully employed to monitor the dynamic process of HSA secretion and degradation. Therefore, we conclude that this assay is a simple and reliable method for the detection of HSA in practical use.
