function user(req, res, next){ if(user == undefined){ passport.use('local', localStrategy); return next(); } else{ return next(); } } router.get('/home', function(req, res, next){ homePage(req, res, req.user.id); });

How do I pass the req.user.id into the homePage function so I can query it?

A: Use the second argument of function to pass in data

router.get('/home', function(req, res, id){ homePage(req, res, id); });
function homePage(req, res, id) { ... }

From documentation The middleware (function) you provide as last argument of call() can access the request and response of the current request with the request and response parameters. Call Function with Request and Response Q: When are user defined javascript object functions assigned to window? I've been struggling to resolve this, but I just wanted to know for sure. Why is it that in javascript, user defined object functions are assigned to the window object? When are these objects assigned to window? Edit: It took me a while to find the answer, but I actually am in the wrong place. The answer I posted, is for a person who wants to know when they are being assigned to window. My question is actually about when the object is created. If you are wondering where I thought you had to use 'window' - you don't. I thought that was what the title of this post was meant to convey... A: The point is to allow you to use the function as a global function. // creates a new object and assigns a function to
