metabolic improvement following suicide attempt. This study investigated the natural history of metabolic function and weight in depression following a suicide attempt. Seventy-three patients treated in a psychiatric emergency service were categorized into three groups based on whether they had attempted suicide with deliberate overdose of a medication, failed to complete the overdose, or had made an unsuccessful non-suicidal attempt. Oral glucose tolerance was assessed at regular intervals during the first year following the attempt and compared to patients without previous suicide attempt. In the first 2 months following the suicide attempt, patients with prior medication overdose, failed overdose, or non-suicidal attempt showed significant improvement in glucose tolerance compared to patients with no prior suicide attempt, irrespective of age, gender, pretreatment body weight, or severity of depression. Twelve months after the suicide attempt, glucose tolerance in the overdose group was within the normal range but depressed patients with prior suicide attempt still differed significantly in oral glucose tolerance from their peers without previous suicide attempt. Changes in oral glucose tolerance were related to pretreatment body weight but were independent of psychiatric outcome. The results indicate that a history of previous suicide attempt is associated with a relatively benign course of illness, early improvement in oral glucose tolerance, and substantial improvement in body weight. Here we report two new glutamate/aspartate-specificities within the SARS-CoV 3a protein (32% sequence identity with the SARS 3C-like proteinase-triggering domain of the 3CL protease of SARS coronavirus). The first specificity
