Elden Rings RingsQ: Rigid control surfaces of high speed aircraft What are the aircraft manufacturers in the western world that actually design rigid control surfaces? I am referring to airplanes, helicopters etc. Surely there are some rigid control surfaces in existence, although it might seem counterintuitive to build a rigidly controlled surface on an airplane that goes hundreds and even thousands of miles per hour. I would suspect that there would only be a few high speed rigid control surfaces in existence, maybe a few from the French over 100 Kph, and then probably just a handful that maybe have gone for the sake of it. But the reason I make this question, is my friend born in the 80s thinks after the autonomous cockpit, who would have been flying these, would have been the first to have rigid control surfaces. A: The BAC Strikemaster was intended to be a "flying road sign". It also had a very complicated, multi-stage control system. During the earlier days of flight control design, washout of the early fixed-pitch/single-lever design was a major design concern and of flight control designers. Specifically, regardless of whether the landing gear was up or down, the plane would develop a nose-down pitch. The pilot would try to correct that, and pushing either side of the vertical rudder would eventually sink the plane. Later designs addressed this by providing high static thrust
