Field of the Invention The present invention relates generally to an apparatus and method for analyzing the degree of integration of a semiconductor memory and, more particularly, to an apparatus and method for analyzing the degree of integration of a semiconductor memory, which can divide a memory chip having a program area and a data area for data storage, into a plurality of blocks so that the degree of integration of the semiconductor memory can be assessed, by analyzing the number of bits simultaneously fail in the program area and data area. 2. Description of the Prior Art Many efforts have been made to achieve an increase in the degree of integration of a semiconductor memory as a part of recent efforts to develop an ultra large scale integration (ULSI) semiconductor memory. Under this context, in conjunction with the recent development in the semiconductor industry, there is increasing interest in measuring the degree of integration of a semiconductor memory in a fabrication process, in that this information can assist in determining the quantity of labor and the amount of cost saved in the development of next-generation micro-electronic devices. As an example, a failure analysis of the degree of integration of a semiconductor memory is made based on the analysis of the number of bits simultaneously fail in the data area and the program area. A conventional integrated circuit memory chip has a structure in which a program area and a data area are coupled in series with a plurality of parallel signal lines,
