Khan's Mongol Empire, 1199-1259 Since publishing India of 1900, I have been asked a number of questions about the Mongols, perhaps the most frequently asked being “if the Mongols did not conquer China, why did they form such an empire?” I would thank you to refer to my blog for an answer or better yet, do your own research. But I hope this review will help you to understand why the rise of the Mongol Empire was truly one of the greatest stories in world history. Orientations Before I begin to discuss the reasons for the Mongol empire’s success, I would like to quickly sketch its geographical parameters. In the year 23 after Christ, tribes of the Oirat (or ‘of’) and two other groups - the Khalkha or Yuz, a medet (a member of the Khalkha) and the Wanchoi (the ‘correct’ spelling of a non-Chinese tribe) - united to form the Mongol empire that encompassed the eastern third of China, together with much of the rest of the Mongolian plateau and

Mongolia itself, incorporating Persia and the Middle East with South and Central Asia. For most of the history of the Mongol Empire, Mongol rule covered most of China (the Mongolian Empire existed, in part, on the map I have here) but in 1368, the Ming dynasty, the last traditional Chinese dynasty, ended control of China's significant southern provinces to the Vietnamese. The regions of the Mongols that lie to the south, Myanmar, Thailand and Indochina, and those to the north, Eastern Europe, Central Asia and Mongolia (together with Russia) are often referred to as the Circum-Mongolian Region. I have read that the Desert Peoples of the Hittite, Kurgan and Altaic cultures were the actual 'mother' of the Mongols with the first migrating from the south to the north, and being replaced by Mongol-Turkic peoples moving in the same direction, as to establish an empire encompassing East, Southeast Asia, Mongolia and north-Central Asia. Perhaps that cannot be proven, but clearly the Mongols represented a point of convergence of geographical possibilities. At one time, the Mongols controlled more territories than any other world culture in history but today, they have been eclipsed by the United States and the USSR. The significance of the Mongols, however, can never be overstated.
