Typically the carpet pile has a pile yarn needle with a sharp pointed head that is moved back and forth in a reciprocating path. Piles of pile yarn are picked up by the needle, over a restricted portion of the needle path, as the needle moves back and forth, and the pile yarn is inserted into the backing ply. Such a procedure is a rapid and efficient way of installing the pile in a carpet. However, the pile yarn being transferred to the needle has a tendency to grow in length if left to hang freely for an extended period of time. The pile yarn may then be cut to a desired length. When the carpet pile is trimmed to a relatively short length, the fibers at the point of the cutting blade are essentially aligned in the plane of the carpet face. However, since the pile grows substantially in length in its remaining portion, the pile fibers may be skewed relative to the planar face of the carpet. If the carpet is lying in a vehicle, such as in a truck, when the carpet is initially installed, the accumulated random pile fibers are not easily compressed to a single plane. Indeed, because of the random piling, only certain fibers at the point of the cutting blade have adequate force to guide the pile fibers as the cutter performs its cutting operation. The result is that only a portion of the pile fibers at the point of the cutting blade are aligned with a planar surface of the face of the carpet. Since only a portion of the pile fibers are pressed or pushed out of the carpet face, the pile fibers fail to be compressed into a single planar surface of the carpet face. To overcome this tendency of the cut pile to be skewed in the carpet face, carpets have been designed such that there is a minimal displacement of pile in the plane

I am writing a simple sequential search function, and I was wondering if it would be better (more efficient?) to use an array of the numbers I am searching for rather than a vector? A: You can use the vector in this case. It is not usually a better choice. If you want, you can in some cases make the array vector and leave the container as a container. --TEST-- Test if an internal resource handle was properly closed. --FILE--
