Palpitations are not infrequent in everyday clinical practice. The most frequent form of palpitations is paroxysmal supraventricular tachycardia, but recently it has been diagnosed far more often in symptom-free individuals. Among the most frequently observed forms of this disease are: a single episode of palpitations accompanied by dizziness and other non-specific symptoms, palpitations sometimes associated with panic attacks, paroxysmal palpitations with a clearly defined course, frequently accompanied by palpitations, which is generally not accompanied by any particular symptoms and has unknown origin. It is desirable to make a precise diagnosis in order to select a more appropriate therapy. The diagnosis of a wide range of diseases of the heart and the examination of the vasculature represent the most important tasks. Often, both are performed simultaneously using imaging methods. The use of computed tomography (CT) is today the most common method in the diagnostic process. Since the heart and coronary arteries are closely related to each other, the influence of the movement of the heart on the result of examinations is quite significant. The data of previous examinations must be taken into consideration as well. In patients with paroxysmal tachycardia there is a risk that the intracardiac catheter will move significantly. Because in CT angiography examinations are performed in the resting state, prior to catheterisation, it is sufficient to perform a single examination at this time. In patients with paroxysmal tachycardia the possibility of venous puncture is

've just uploaded a new beta version of Python - 2.6.4. You should update your Python to this latest version if you haven't already. See here for detailed instructions. In the beta version of 2.6.4, CPython's garbage collector has been slightly improved. (Many thanks to Max Jaffer for providing me the information). You may now use gc.collect() to call the GC. This is done automatically at the end of the CPython interpreter's run time. If you use gc.collect(), you may have to call gc.collect() again when you run out of memory. With the new functionality, you do not need to manually call gc.collect() in your code. There are some minor fixes for Python 2.6.4 and 2.7.1 as well. The usual bug fixes and improvements are also included in this new version. Download Python 2.6.4 from here. You might like to read about the rationale of migrating to a new Python release on the Python Developer Reference. Major Changes to Python 2.6 Python 2.6.4 introduces new APIs for threading and multiprocessing. These two features provide a simple interface for producing parallel processing on multiple cores and multiple processors. Threading. The Python multiprocessing library comes with a library module and the submodule multiprocessing.pool. This module provides a simple interface for creating worker processes and managing their startup and execution. You can submit tasks to these processes and have them execute the tasks. In particular, you can pass tasks to these processes as functions. You don't need to write your own worker threads or processes. The new threading module makes it easier to execute code as a separate thread within the interpreter. It is based on the current thread, so for example, if you call sleep() on a new thread, sleep() will be executed in the new thread. It does not, however, support cooperative multitasking. (We need more time before considering this feature). The new threading module is part of Python 2.6.4, but a separate library module and submodule ( multiprocessing.pool ) are not yet included in the installation file for 2.6.4. This is because the 2.6 bff6bb2d33
