Publisher's Description Welcome to Casual Game

Engine! Casual Game Engine is another playground for both gamers and developers. With the game engine you can create your own singleplayer shooter games in 2D in top-down perspective using AngelScript. Games can be made as standalone games, mods and, if desired, shared with Steam (you need an own developer account for that). Casual Game Engine utilizes the famous AngelScript scripting language which has its valid place in the game development universe. It is easy to learn and has an easy understandable C++ style syntax. Your actual game is implemented by creating custom entities, player behaviour and define maps with custom entities. You can just launch the engine GUI builder, create a new project and everything is generated for you. You then just have to modify the entity source files. We suggest to use VS Code as editor. Note that this product is quite oldschool: There is no visual scripting or map editor included yet, so this is preferably suited for developers who like to write code. What's new in Robotpencil Presents: Exercise: Brushwork:

And Politics (2014) After a period of neglect, an epochal shift in technological power occurred. A sudden transformation of central technology, which had been the preserve of the most advanced nations, displaced them to a more modest level of technological capability. While this may seem a change for the worse, it really goes further than that. This was not simply an improvement on past performance; it was a complete revolution, in effect the founding of the Information Age. The obvious way to characterize today's technology revolution is to observe that it has not just evolved, but spread so widely as to shape nearly every aspect of human activity. For example, so powerful is global communications and the internet that many people have come to regard these as the central factors in popularly labeled "globalization." In fact, these phenomena serve as a useful context for contemporary developments, as they present us with a practical and compelling instance of the broader, more sweeping phenomena of post-industrialization. It is precisely this technological contraction, and the transformation of the global economy that goes with it, that we are going to cover in this article. Globalization, also known as post-industrialization, is a persistent story of accelerating change, and a central theme of our historical moment. It is not just about the transformation of economic production, but the transformation of politics, notably the rise of new political and economic alliances, along with new forms of state; though the two are not always kept distinct by many observers. Politically, globalization is linked to the rise of forms of transnational organization which were in effect new governmental powers. Arguably, they resulted from the greater strengthening of the nation-state - the argument, we should point out, remains contentious. Until recently, globalization was restricted mainly to economic activities in such areas as information and communications. But its main center of gravity has shifted. Just as physical goods and services were largely privatized, so information and ideas are rapidly being privatized as well. This new aspect of globalization is a dramatic phenomenon, and questions of the future are raised at an even more fundamental level. For it is not just about the preservation of high technologies, but their constitutive part. When former leading science journal Nature stopped publishing the Physical Review in 1979, a salient statement of the concept was that “physics is finished: it is done.” By the same token, if we regard chemistry as a branch of industry, then it is also evidently finished. What is about to happen

Zenith is one of the oldest and the largest manufacturers of mechanical watch. Zenith is defined by high-quality watch designs, exceptional performance, flexibility of style, precision engineering and reliability. The Zenith company is also extremely well respected by its clients. The organization embodies over 100 years of experience and the commitment of its employees to the products and the customers. Zenith was founded in 1884 in France by the master watchmaker Frédéric Chausey. Today, Zenith is based in Geneva, Switzerland, with a flagship store and factory in the city. This year's Watch Expo was held in Las Vegas, Nevada. For the 3rd consecutive year the company presented its full range of watches at this expo. Zenith presented also its unique new variety of components, which significantly differs from the usual parts. This year, Zenith showed this new collection on the annual Watch Expo in Las Vegas. To enter into this new collection, Zenith relied on a completely different construction method. The first part is called "To create a work of art," which is made of bronze and ceramic. The collection includes a wide variety of men's models and women's models, which are covered by different combinations of precious stones. The look of these watches is unique and slightly retro. The details of the jewelry and design of the dial are similar to classic Zenith watches from the past. But the choice of stones and the color for the dial is absolutely new. Aside from the dial and the design, the most innovative part of this collection is the movement mechanism. In this collection, Zenith introduces two models with two different movements. Each has its own functions that you could use in any watches and in a wide variety of styles. These watches have the following functions: - Mechanical movement with an oscillation frequency of 9
