ing NDAA Arrests — UN Guide: The Green Light For NSA Spy Subs from the that's-better dept So far as anyone can determine, the United States is working to pass a new National Defense Authorization Act this week. This is a big event, because it precedes the NDAA and usually talks about it. Nary a year goes by without the NDAA being proposed. Here's the good news: The Senate is currently working on version S. 2854. So far, that means that the US Senate is introducing and voting on a new NDAA this week. And, as has been the case with the past two NDAs, it is being introduced outside of any attempt at a public debate. That would be a shame, but these Congresses have adopted this precedent, and it has seemed to have limited impact overall. This appears to be the fourth iteration of the Bill. The House introduced an NDAA in 1973. This process took quite a lot of time, and was in part held up by a vote on the Vietnam Peace Treaty in that year (the vote didn't pass, thanks to the anti-war movement). At that time, the bill was nicknamed the "Enslaved Act" because it instituted a series of legislative limits on resistance. In the 1971 version, there was for the first time an attempt to prevent assisting a foreign government.

While that was a relatively weak attempt to hold back people who were already helping other countries (as the US authorities were well aware even then), the 1973 version went further, authorizing the killing of foreign leaders. That has been a problem in the past, though it's one that has mostly been ignored until recently. The House announced that it would suspend the rules and vote on the NDAA in 2009. That passed, but no one knew precisely why it was done. It's the exception that proves the rule. Whether because of fear of international opinion, because the Powers That Be want to do it, or because of general incompetence inside the House about how to handle NDAs, the NDAA has been pushed through without much public discussion or debate. This year, in the late stages of this debate, there has been a terrible misinterpretation of what the law was proposing. It was carefully revised version of a bill that sat alongside it for a long time. That bill suggested a fast track for militarized police called the "Federal Law Enforcement Training Center" or FLETC. The House version of the NDAA has simply
