Q: Trying to understand how a camera lens uses a sensor In this video, they show a sensor on top of a camera, and a lens underneath. The video says that it's first projected light onto the sensor, and then converted into electric signals. However, I don't understand how this is possible. A lens is opaque, so it doesn't accept light. I thought that only light reflected from a surface was allowed through. I also don't understand the difference between the lens and the sensors covered by the video. I don't think that the lens translates light into electric signals. The lens just allows light to enter and perhaps focuses it. But does it use a sensor? A: A lens projects, focuses, and thus projects. The image is projected from the lens and onto the sensor. What happens afterward is not important (except to what end the image data is used).

The importance of the inotropic effect of periventricular neurosecretory nuclei in the area of the medial preoptic nucleus in the central control of thermoregulation. Experiments were carried out on 18 Wistar rats. Electrolytic lesions of the medial preoptic nucleus (MPN) resulted in a decrease in thermoregulatory centres response to moderate thermal stimuli (decrease in the activity of solar homeostasis centre). The injection of noradrenaline (NA) into the MPN was effective in increasing the threshold of thermoregulatory response. Injection of the A 10-B 20
