Biodegradation of the pyrethroid type insecticide bifenthrin by two rhizobia isolated from silver ginkgo, i.e., Pseudomonas JG1 and Rhizobium JB2, and the role of the nitrogen uptake system. Two rhizobia, Pseudomonas JG1 and Rhizobium JB2, isolated from silver ginkgo were tested for their ability to degrade the synthetic insecticide bifenthrin. Both organisms degraded this insecticide at a rate that was proportional to the available nitrogen levels in the medium as well as the insecticide concentration. The bifenthrin-degradation activities of both organisms were inhibited by addition of the nitrogenous compound 2-(furyl-(S))benzoic acid (FBA) in a dose-dependent manner. Culture experiments indicated that both organisms were able to utilize bifenthrin as a sole carbon and nitrogen source and degraded it with either aerobic or anaerobic procedures. The degradation of bifenthrin by Rhizobium JB2 was much slower than that by Pseudomonas JG1. Maximum degradation of bifenthrin was obtained when the processes of nitrogen fixation and aerobic/anaerobic respiration were simultaneously occurring.No matter what your personal skill set is, you can still find a job in
