Every big-budget movie these days opens with an apology to the audience: We know you are going to spend five hours watching this, so we wanted to make sure that you come away with a better understanding of some of the elements of this production than you had going in. That's a savvy move, both as an admission of the difficulty and the scope of the project, but also as a way to draw attention to the aesthetics of the film. When you create a stunning visual environment, you need to tell people how beautiful it is. You need to throw them into it and let them fall in love with it. It's the same concept with writing, particularly in recent years: When we say something like "This book or story or TV show is really engaging, and we want you to believe in it," it's usually because what we're saying is true. I spend a lot of time writing about how we make movies, and I often use the example of Star Wars: The Last Jedi to describe the difference between writing and directing. There are a lot of ways to write about film, and I'm not going to argue against the idea that some are more useful than others; I've tried to take a few of the tools I use in my own writing and apply them to the stories I tell about the films I write about, and the ones that apply to those stories end up being the ones that I find the most interesting. But in the end, they all boil down to one thing: They have to sound true. We've gotten the most out of any of this by focusing on the story. That's the way you become an expert: you write about the thing you love, not the thing you think is most interesting. In other words, you write about the thing that makes you the most passionate. Two years ago Mike Nadel, a professor of economics at the University of Massachusetts, Amherst, began to wonder what would happen if the price of a home reached $10 million. What kind of demand could we expect? He set up a website where people could enter how many bedrooms and how many bathrooms they wanted in their home, and what they wanted to pay
