A door is an architectural feature used to partition spaces such as rooms or offices from each other. Examples of fixed walls, of which a door is a part, are the walls of rooms or offices themselves, walls in a bathroom, fences and walls of storage spaces. The walls of the rooms or offices are made of a material such as wood, steel, or any of a variety of the same building materials such as brick, stone, or cement. The surfaces of the walls are constructed so as to provide partitioning, and thus to allow for the creation of spaces for lighting, air circulation, water drainage, etc. Windows, as opposed to doors, are used in buildings to provide a lighted view of the outside world. Windows that are not fixed are usually not closed with walls to partition the space enclosed by them. These windows may be made in an opening in a building or wall, or they may be made in a surrounding frame that is installed above a door. In the latter cases, windows are typically made from glass that is framed by the frame. In some cases, a window may be formed from a sliding panel that closes to enclose a space. In the past, these types of windows, referred to as either anteroom windows or French doors, were usually made from wood.

No missing data and long-term memory in patients with major depression. Abnormalities in working memory have been associated with major depression. In the present study the authors explored whether similar abnormalities were observed in long-term memory. An integrated picture of the effects of depression is still missing because most studies were only of relatively short duration. To investigate long-term memory in depressive patients, performance on the Wisconsin Card Sorting Test was compared with that of 14 healthy control subjects. Groups did not differ in the number of total errors or perseverative errors, but the depressed patients showed higher numbers of FASD (false alarm) errors. After correction for IQ, there were no significant differences between groups. However, long-term memory as measured by the percentage of false alarms as a function of delay (5, 10, 20, 40 or 80 sec) was significantly impaired in the patients. Within the depressive group, findings were comparable for patients who were treated for less than 6 months and for those who had been treated for more than 6 months. The authors conclude that long-term memory deficits in depressive patients are equally likely to be found in chronic or in short-term depression.
