One of the first things that comes to mind when you think about software is that your computer or smartphone should be able to do almost anything. You want it to be able to read books, listen to music, compute and compute faster than any computer on Earth, communicate with people and devices around the world, and display a stunning collection of fine art. There's just one problem: as spectacular as a machine is, there's not a lot of room inside. It's unlikely that your next computer will have the drive space for a human brain. In fact, it's unlikely that it will have a solid state hard drive either. But what if there were some way to put a chip so small it could fit almost anywhere in the machine, given enough room? What if the chip could process information more efficiently than anything else on the planet? Can you see where we're going with this? EMBODIED COMPUTERS Meet the brains of Emobiled Inc., a company that sees far greater potential in brains and computing devices than the average person. The company makes computers that can literally be implanted under the skin, enabling users to experience the computer interface in a new way that makes the device feel like an extension of their own brain. Next month, Emobiled is partnering with neuroscientists to produce the second generation of its computers — a device that will double the brain's abilities. In a few years from now, the computers will no longer need power cords and will be able to interface with the surrounding physical world in a way that truly changes the way we think. The first generation computers began retailing this summer, starting at just $4,999 for a pair. The concept is simple, says Dr. Robert Gillies, the company's chief medical officer. "It's an interface with your brain," he says, "but it's still a laptop." d0c515b9f4
