Find the products and information you need at our site. Male Pattern Baldness As hair loss begins, hair follicles in the affected areas stop producing the normal amount of hair and then in a few years completely disappear. This usually affects a person’s hairline, crown and temples first. As the hair loss becomes more extensive, other areas of the scalp may be affected. Male pattern baldness is a progressive condition that involves noticeable hair loss occurring in men in the area of the scalp opposite the hairline. This means a man with a widow’s peak may have more hair loss on top of the head than around the sides. The hair loss is usually slow and gradual, starting on the top and sides of the scalp and then moving in to the crown. Your scalp may appear to have a fine texture to it. A man with male pattern baldness may have hair loss within the following areas of the scalp: With the exception of certain drugs, if the hair loss is already an advanced stage, there is currently no cure. The good news is that there are lots of treatments available that can successfully reduce the appearance of hair loss and hair thinning. 1) Minoxidil 2%) is the most commonly prescribed therapy for male pattern baldness. It works by stimulating hair follicles, slowing hair loss and thickening your hair follicles. In addition, some experts claim that minoxidil’s effectiveness is equal to or greater than that of Propecia and Rogaine. 2) Finasteride, a generic form of Propecia, is another popular treatment. Finasteride is very effective in preventing hair loss in men with excess hair loss from Male Pattern Baldness. Finasteride is expensive and should be purchased only if your physician prescribes it for
