In some cases, the promotional incentive may be provided directly by the service provider, for example, in the form of a gift card redeemable at a gift shop or a grocery store. In other cases, the promotional incentive may be provided by a third-party intermediary, for example, a merchant having a physical location where the consumer may acquire the gift card. If a consumer chooses to acquire a gift card from a third party, the third party will often require the consumer to pay for the gift card before the gift card can be redeemed. In some cases, the consumer may be directed to a third-party web site where the consumer can complete a web page to purchase the gift card. However, even after the payment, the consumer may still have to wait for the third party to order and ship the gift card, in which time the consumer may lose interest in the product or service.
