Understanding the properties of pixels The color of pixels in an image is called the color value. In Photoshop, you can modify the color value of pixels of any color, but pixels with a black color value or no color value are simply black or white pixels and appear gray in a grayscale image. Keep in mind that when you change the color value of a pixel, you're changing the color value of that pixel. To make a grayscale image or photo look a particular way, you must apply one of the two color options available to every pixel. * **Black:** When a pixel is black, it has a black color value; that is, the pixel's color value is 0 (zero). The grayscale image mode lets you hide the pixels, and it's useful when you want to hide any portion of the image, as shown in Figure 6-7. * **White:** When a pixel is white, it has a 100 percent color value; that is, the pixel's color value is

Q: Can I modify a Salesforce.com Worklight adapter with a workspace? I have a project that developed with Worklight Studio 6.0 and we installed it into our QA environment. I made some changes in adapter code that I need to deploy into our production instance and in order to do it I need to modify the adapter code and deployment configuration (adding some parameters and changing the value of some variables), but I need to be able to do it without touching the source code of my changes. So I found out that I could edit the source code of my project and modify the adapter code in situ. But the problem is that I have a workspace, so the modified code is not recognized by Worklight Studio. And I can't modify source code in place, because the workspace is protected. The question is, can I modify a Salesforce.com adapter code that I develop with Worklight Studio using a workspace? A: You can indeed modify the source code of an adapter in a workspace - just make sure you understand the implications. If you do this, the version which you have made changes to (the one from the workspace) will be deployed to the server, but there will also be a corresponding cloned copy in the workspace that you can continue to modify. Obviously, the changes to the code are not automatically (re-)processed when you deploy the version back from the workspace to the server, but as you have already done that in your question, that should not be a problem. If you later clone the server, you will also end up with a cloned copy of the workspace's (app) source code that you can modify (as you are already doing). The invention pertains to the field of computer systems. More particularly, the invention pertains to a method and system for controlling access to a network. Computer system users employ a variety of different types of computing devices to send and receive messages via electronic mail, to surf the world wide web, and to use various other computer applications. For example, over the last several years, the world wide web has become increasingly popular, due in part to the development of communication systems that support the ability to connect millions of computers around the globe. The world wide web is a collection of information resources on the Internet, also referred to as the “Web” or the “HTTP” (Hypertext Transfer Protocol) web. A web server makes web pages available to
