What's new:

Posen The Battle Army Posen (Polish: Armia Bojowa Warszawa) was a Polish army that fought during the Polish-Bolshevik War on Soviet soil. It existed after the independent Polish state was forced to temporarily cede western Belorussia to the Soviet Union during the Polish-Soviet War. Prelude In the 1920 campaign for Vilnius, the Polish Army of the Interbellum stretched to 1.2 million soldiers. The Red Army for the Soviets of Peter Dehn, a former commander, had around 800,000 soldiers. Almost a fifth of them was mounted. After the Treaty of Riga, the Polish army withdrew from the border of Riga and its western suburbs to the river Daugava in late January 1920, east of the so-called Naliboki bridgehead. To the north, its left flank reached the town of Dvinsk, while its right flank ended at the Polish-Lithuanian border near the town of Śmiłowo. The Armia Bojowa, subsequently, to garrison Puck (Pawikowo), a town which became a center of counter-insurgency operations carried out by the Polish Army on orders from Marshal Józef Piłsudski after the clash between the two Polish armies ended on 7 January 1920 in a clear victory for the Soviets. At the time, the entire Army Posen had around 100,000 soldiers. That army was commanded by General Mieczyslaw Jankowski, who led the new army in the central sector of the frontiers. The Polish border troops consisted of Polish Army infantry units and several battalions of the various Polish volunteer units. The Polish Army was reinforced with several reserve units, among which the Trans-Baikal Freikorps. Before the start of the war, the commander of the Polish Army was General Antoni Szylling. Initial phases After the Polish army, commanded by Marshal Józef Piłsudski, arrived to the border of the Riga and renewed the war against the Soviet forces, on February 23, 1920 the first clashes of the war were begun. The army took positions on the border and in all neighboring territories. The right flank of the army pushed into the Mamonovo forest near Sanok. The so-called Trans Baikal Freikorps (also known as the Freikorps von Kleist
