Q: How to keep footnotes while serializing objects to XML with XmlSerializer? I'm converting an old ASP.Net app to use Entity Framework for the data access. While working on it, I found out that the footnotes I had included in a table were lost when I created a new model based on the existing database and the original model. I realized that it was due to using the XmlSerializer to serialize the objects to XML. My solution is to generate the XML "manually", using XmlTextWriter and XmlDocument, but this is not an option because I need to serialize a lot of objects. Is there a way to keep the footnotes, or "somehow" to force the XmlSerializer to keep them when serializing?
A: It's an old post, but I found a different way of serializing it. You can serialize it this way, using the SoapFormatter to include the footnotes in your SOAP documents:

Biblical Fortress Dungeon There were no dinosaur fossils, since the Cretaceous period ended at the K-T boundary. By then, the world was blanketed in ice and the dinosaurs were already extinct. But there was a mighty dinosaur-like creature, that was still living, in the sea-covered continent. The city was named Aranyapura, the city of king Ravana, and it was an ancient city. It had a magnificent castle. There was a fortress called "Aristocrat's Heaven" that protected the city. The people of the city were prosperous. They were equal to kings and princes. There were 10 Kings, so in all, they were 40 men. They lived off the riches of the city. The city was called Varanasi, the city of the Gods, and was a holy city. There were numerous temples, a famous one called "Sri Peetha Peetha", and a magnificent idol of the God Siva. It was the greatest symbol of the Gods. It was also the place where Shiva and Ganga, God and Goddess of all rivers, met and mingled with each other. There was a large rock known as "Surya Tirtha", a holy fountain, that Shiva had blessed. It was in this city that he had done countless of miracles. There were 100 streets leading to the tirtha, and it was said that everyone, who went there, could be fulfilled. The city was considered as the greatest place, since it was the birthplace of Lord Shiva. People from all over the world came to the city to worship. It was famous for its "Coo-shanat", a medicinal liquor, that was very soothing to the eyes, and also good for one's stomach. There were many temples, and Keshav Mahadev temple, was the most famous, since Shiva was born here. But as time passed by, the King built more houses on the banks of river Ganga, which led to the Surya Tirtha, and the life of the people declined. All the families were mixed, but there were still many poor people in the city. They were all gathered together, and it was like a family. But the street children of the city were not a part of this family. They had to live a life of suffering.

Gameplay The goal of the game is to help a turtle named Raccoon out of captivity in a fortress in a small island. There are four levels to the game and two different endings. Plot Raccoon was put in a cage where he had to wait until he ate the food the guards offered him. After a few days he became hungry and depressed. Raccoon was fed his favorite food and he began to recover. Days later the food began to increase in quantity, but Raccoon was not so happily. As he finished eating, he noticed many of his fellow prisoners were fed some food that they had to eat slowly. One of the guards was getting his attention by being giggling and started to tease him. Raccoon started to get violent and also without feelings begins to tear down the clothes of his neighboring cells. Fearing for his life, the guards took Raccoon to a floor of the fortress called "The Thunder", which is a hard place that needs only three prisoners to become friends, but no one bothered with Raccoon. The guard telling him that he will be the next to be there, after a few days of this behavior, a spotlight was turned on him. Raccoon watches the scoreboard and sees he has five days left to live. Once Raccoon was alone in his cell, he became so depressed he didn't want any more food. He began to read his books. Those books made him feel better, but he was captured once again. While he was being taken to be killed, his book made him feel like he was walking to his death when he read a song he knew. He began to get angry and decided to stand up for himself and his friend. Several guards were waiting for him and he was facing them with hatred for a second time. When he was finally given the chance to help his friends,
