G-protein-coupled receptors (GPCRs) often undergo plasticity in their functional properties in vivo. In other cases, the receptors are stabilized following chronic agonist exposure in vitro and this "tolerance" is generally accompanied by down-regulation of surface expression. We recently demonstrated that the mu opioid receptor, MOR, is up-regulated and down-regulated when administered long-term intracerebroventricularly (ICV) or peripherally (intravenous), respectively. Here, we further explore the possibility that the chronic morphine treatment may change the molecular forms of the receptor. ICV morphine for 2 weeks increased the 3 and 4 subunits of the G-protein,  $G\alpha(i)$  and  $G\alpha(i3)$ . However, morphine administered peripherally for 2 weeks did not change the abundance of MOR on plasma membranes. Interestingly, the membrane-associated opioid receptor proteins and the quantal release of [(3)H]dihydromorphine-binding sites (DHMBs) were increased in the mouse spinal cord when the morphine treatment was initiated peripherally. These results demonstrate that chronic morphine can induce changes in the molecular forms of the MOR. Because the receptor was isolated under non-denaturing conditions, it is possible that these findings reflect an interaction of MOR with protein(s) in the microsomal membranes rather than a direct effect of morphine on the receptor protein. It is possible that the MOR exists in multiple molecular forms in the membrane and that these forms may increase, decrease or be modified by chronic opioid administration. You're fired! Work is a two-sided coin. By and large, it's all an interesting experiment, filled with surprises, some frustration, and some opportunity for fun, for learning and for inspiring. Of course, this isn't always the case. Perhaps you're working in a department of people who either don't care about their jobs or don't care about working. Or you might find yourself in a situation where a crisis arises at work, or you've been asked to perform tasks for which you feel you don't have the required expertise or training. Maybe you've been asked to

Q: JavaScript typeof doesn't work when using Google Closure Compiler

The following code

var foo = function(i) { return i; };
var bar =
    foo(42);
console.log(typeof bar); //
    bar is a number is compiled to var foo =
function(i){ return i; };
var bar = foo(42);

---

`console.log(bar);` As you can see, the compiler removed `typeof bar` from the compiled code. Why this code doesn't throw a `ReferenceError`? A: The `typeof` operator is a function on a reference object, in the form of a function that returns a string representing the type of the object. `typeof` returns a string representing the type of the object not the reference to the object.

---

By not returning the reference to the object, closure has the opportunity to eliminate it. When you call `typeof foo(42)` you are not calling the type `1cdb36666d`
