The code bellow does not print 'class variable' : class A: def __init__(self): print ('class variable') b = A() thread1 = threading.Thread(target=b.__init__) thread2 = threading.Thread(target=b.__init__) thread1.start() thread2.start() b.do_something() What I would like to have is something like a class variable which is inherited by all instances when an instance is created : class A: class variable: [] def __init__(self): A.variable.append('instance A') print ('class variable') b = A() thread1 = threading.Thread(target=b.__init__) thread2 = threading.Thread(target=b.__init__) thread1.start() thread2.start() b.do_something() But if I do so, then I get the error : NameError: name 'A' is not defined What is the problem? I know about self.variable, but this is a design issue. I cannot change the class definition. Thanks A: You need to prefix the class name with A in order to refer to it properly in the class definition: class A: class variable: [] def __init__(self): A.variable.append('instance A') print ('class variable') # class variable: [] b = A() thread1 = thread 0cc13bf012
