Thymic medullary carcinoid tumors are rare tumors with intermediate malignancy. Thymic medullary carcinoid tumors arise most commonly in the thymus, but may also be found in the lung, gastrointestinal tract, central nervous system, breast and uterus. Identification of thymic medullary carcinoid as a primary neoplasm in patients lacking evidence of other neuroendocrine tumors leads to surgery for tumor mass in the affected thymus and systemic diagnostic work-up for possible carcinoid syndrome. The tumor usually exhibits a range of histopathological features, making the diagnosis of primary thymic medullary carcinoid challenging. While thymic medullary carcinoid tumors are rare, they are considered to be biologically malignant and are generally considered to behave more aggressively than carcinoids arising elsewhere in the body. Thymic medullary carcinoid is histologically characterized by small round, uniform cells with a high mitotic index, vesicular nuclei and high nuclear to cytoplasmic ratios. We report a case of a thymic medullary carcinoid with unusual intraparenchymal tumor masses demonstrating increased mitotic activity. The findings associated with these histologically atypical lesions and an unusually high Ki-67 labeling index led to a diagnosis of a neuroendocrine tumor with atypical neuroendocrine differentiation.
