sulfur protein isolated from spinach chloroplasts has been investigated. The protein was highly depleted in phosphorus. The phosphorus content of the protein was determined directly by measuring the phosphorus in the constituent amino acids at pH 9.0 and 10.2. The stoichiometry of the iron-sulfur centers was determined by using spectral probes for the iron-sulfur centers (iron, midpoint and edge infrared spectra) and the sulfurs (visible and near infrared spectra). The protein was best-determined to be symmetric (2Fe-2S1-1P) as indicated by the following observations: (i) The iron-sulfur composition of the protein in the presence of added stoichiometric amounts of sulfide was 1Fe-1S1. (ii) The midpoint and edge iron-sulfur spectra showed maxima at the same wavelengths. (iii) The iron-sulfur center was not split by either dithionite or potassium ferricyanide. These results confirm that the isolated protein contains one and only one iron-sulfur center which has a thio-bridged iron-sulfur skeleton that is symmetric in terms of the iron-sulfur pairs and the number of protons attached to the sulfurs. The iron-sulfur center of the protein was 1Fe-1S1 as suggested by reference to the iron-sulfur centers of the non-heme iron-sulfur proteins purified from other organisms. The iron-sulfur center of the protein also showed the typical positive EPR signal of a [2Fe-2S] center. The midpoint and edge iron-sulfur spectra of this center were independent of pH and the iron-sulfur center was not split by either dithionite or potassium ferricyanide. The visible and near infrared spectra showed that the iron-sulfur center of the protein was identical in character to the inorganic iron-sulfur center of the ferredoxin isolated from spinach chloroplasts and the iron-sulfur centers of the ferredoxins purified from other organisms. Furthermore, inorganic phosphate was incorporated bff6bb2d33

What it means? A: That's because this line throws error. ServerCursor.Rows("1")("color") What it means? What it means is that you have more than one row and you want to access a column that's not unique as is the case with all columns in a table where we can have multiple rows having same value for a column. Addition: Adding the code fragment that's causing error, we can see this is where the error is coming from, var row = rows.SingleOrDefault(row => row.Id == id); The above line is throwing exception as there is more than one row with same value for Id.
