Q: Does ExecuteScalar always work with real datatype? I want to make sure that I understand something in terms of storing a variable in a sql statement. I have a simple stored procedure that reads from a table. The field in the table is a string. I am trying to return the field as a datatype: `SELECT MyColumn FROM MyTable WHERE ID = @ID` I want to have this stored procedure return the data from the row where @ID is equal to ID. In my DB I set the column up as a real, so it should be returning a real. Is this how the stored procedure should be written? `IF @ID = 0 BEGIN SELECT MyColumn FROM MyTable WHERE ID = 0 END ELSE BEGIN SELECT MyColumn FROM MyTable WHERE ID = @ID END` If I run this, then my return value is 0. If I run this: `IF @ID = 0 BEGIN SELECT MyColumn FROM MyTable WHERE ID = 0 END ELSE BEGIN SELECT MyColumn FROM MyTable WHERE ID = @ID END` then it returns the value from the row correctly. I am not sure what is going on with this. When I run the stored procedure in Management Studio, the value I get back is 0, which makes sense since the stored procedure is working on @ID which is 0. However, when I run the stored procedure by just passing in the parameters, then I am returning the correct data. Is the fact that I am using a stored procedure, but not declaring a datatype somehow causing this? A: c9d1549cdd

Tsukada , a Japanese voice actress and singer-songwriter, is affiliated with the talent agency 81 Produce. She is a former member of the pop trio Cute, which disbanded in 2004. Biography Tsukada's interest in music stems from her father and brother, both of whom are musicians. Her father played guitar and her older brother played piano and they picked up other instruments by helping themselves from their parents' collection. Her mother would attend the family's favorite concerts. When her family caught wind of the success of King Guy, Sugi, and Yumi Katsuta, the trio at the time, they decided to follow in their footsteps. The Tsukada-family members then spent their free time practicing all the instruments they could lay their hands on. Before Tsukada graduated from a Japanese high school at age 15, she felt that she was not very accomplished and needed to make some drastic changes and started working part-time at an all girls' school, focusing on her singing. At that time, Tsukada had enrolled in a study abroad program and was planning to participate in it. The director of the school encouraged Tsukada to prepare a demo and release an album of her songs. She confessed that she did not have the skills to perform in front of people and was really worried, but he answered that she already was good at what she was doing. Feeling encouraged, Tsukada drafted a list of songs and recording a demo. In the follow-up school year, she transferred to another school that was less busy and better suited for her. Within one year, she released an album, which officially launched her career and was met with critical acclaim. She continued to release albums more frequently throughout her school years, selling over five million copies and making her one of the best-selling women in music. During her senior year at school, her friendship and musical partnership with Kenichi Tokura developed, eventually pairing them up to form the all-girl pop quartet Cute. Tsukada and Tokura made their debut on August 31, 1997 with the CD, from the sound of the Heart Sparks. They held live performances and fan meetings and quickly rose to become a hot commodity in the new music industry. Even though Cute had been together since their debut, it was never a definite thing until Tokura and Tsukada officially declared their love for each other on Cute's 2000 Riva album, announcing the end of their musical relationship. Tokura and Tsukada both enlisted
