Quantitative analysis of etomidate and its glucuronide metabolite in human plasma by high-performance liquid chromatography. Etomidate, an imidazole derivative, is used as the primary induction agent in anesthesia. However, the pharmacokinetics of this agent have not been fully elucidated, and it has not been possible to monitor the changes in the concentration of this drug in blood due to intravenous injections to patients. Therefore, a sensitive and specific method for the quantitation of etomidate and its glucuronide metabolite in human plasma was developed. Protein precipitation with acetonitrile was employed as the sample preparation. The plasma samples were separated on a C18 reversed-phase column with isocratic elution using a mobile phase containing 3% acetonitrile and 0.1% trifluoroacetic acid (v/v), and monitored with a UV detector at a wavelength of 274 nm. The calibration curves for etomidate and etomidate glucuronide were linear over the concentration range 0.050-10.0 microg/ml and 1.00-100.0 microg/ml, respectively. The limits of quantification were found to be 1.00 microg/ml for both etomidate and etomidate glucuronide. The intra-day relative standard deviation ranged from 1.14 to 8.91% and the inter-day relative standard deviation ranged from 2.51 to 8.94% for etomidate and 1.40-9.16% and 2.81-9.85% for etomidate glucuronide, respectively. A blood sample from a patient was analyzed, and the results of the present method indicated a rapid drop in the concentration of etomidate and its glucuronide in plasma within 3 min, and no evidence of the development of the antianaphylactic effect that this drug produces.
