Link Most of the time, you'll want to have at least 50% of their RAM and space for applications, but anything under 25% is kind of poor. Both 1 GB and 8 GB are reasonable amounts, though you should keep in mind that 8 GB will allow more apps for simultaneous use. But there is one special case where the amount of memory is kind of important: games. For some reason, the list of recommended specs for game consoles is severely lacking, but even so, you need to keep in mind that you'll need a lot of RAM to run any typical game. The amount of CPU is important if you are going to deal with large games or, again, have an overly greedy game that eats up a lot of resources. In either case, you'll want to avoid anything with less than an Intel Core i5-3550 or i7-4770 CPU. If you have a laptop, you'll want to double-check the CPU since different CPUs are often classified as the same when it comes to laptop specs. Ram Memory is the RAM on your device. This is the amount of space you'll be using for apps, the operating system, and any games you might want to play. For computers, you usually only have a few different options when it comes to RAM, including 8 GB, 16 GB, 32 GB, 64 GB, and 128 GB. While 128 GB isn't the most in-demand RAM, it is a great option if you do a lot of video editing or frequently run a spreadsheet that will have you in memory-wasting hell. If you have a laptop, you will have a similar list, but, instead of the standard range of RAM you'll be given, your options will mainly be 16 GB, 32 GB, and 64 GB. A lot of people only give you 4 GB of RAM. Unless you have an iPhone, this isn't a good option for a computer. With an iPhone, you do have an 8 GB option, but you really shouldn't do that. You may already know how to use a basic keyboard on your computer, but most people will at some point have to plug in a keyboard and mouse (maybe even an external one). Those two are the most important parts of a computer, so let's make sure you know how to do both. How to Change 6d1f23a050
