Ledford High School opened in 1949, and was named for Congressman John R. Ledford. It serves grades 9 through 12. History At the time of its opening in 1949, the school was named as "Woodrow Wilson High School" for Woodrow Wilson Junior College, of which it was a charter member. The school was named in recognition of the community's support of the namesake. Wilson High School was officially moved to the former Haden High School campus, named for industrialist George T. Haden and operating in Northwest Houston, before the current school was completed, and named Haden High School, with the charter being moved to Ledford High School. Construction began on the current campus in 1952, and the school was opened in September 1956. The school was an existing comprehensive high school with a capacity of 1,075 students at its dedication, but by the end of the 1960s, led by then-principal E.W. Moon, jr., enrollment had almost doubled to 1,960 students by the mid-1960s. Controversies In 1963, Ledford students, under Moon's leadership, participated in the school lunch boycott, in which students would eat only sandwiches paid for by the Freedom Schools Movement. The school boycott resulted in widespread unease in the community, and the principal was removed. The school returned to the old autonomous status in 1965. In the 1960s, as students in the school embraced protest against the Vietnam War and against racial segregation, some of them were involved in what became known as the Black Panther Party of Houston, and Moon was involved in

We were having dal bhat at an Indian restaurant, and it had been sitting on the menu for quite a while. The server told us that it was now available, so we got it. Upon tasting it, we found it pretty bland, and that it had taken the flavor of the dal to the edge of being completely tasteless. I couldn't tell at all what was the main flavor. I found the same restaurant's Bengali menu, and it had completely different flavors. It was delicious! I wasn't sure which menu is the most representative. I want to know the following: Is the Indian menu 'more authentic' than the Bengali menu? Does the Indian menu have more flavors than the Bengali one? Does the Indian restaurant put more effort on making their food taste better than the Bengali one? A: Bengali cuisine is not just a national cuisine of Bangladesh; it also represents Bengal which is a geographical entity located between India and Burma. Because, the language group of Bengali is a mixed one where the regional and non-regional languages coexist. Therefore, the varieties of ingredients, the recipes, flavor, and traditions used for cooking are quite diverse. This is to mention that, it is difficult to generalize the Bengali cuisine in one specific category. The same goes for the Indian cuisine but from the other perspective (India) the flavours/cuisines are quite distinctive. It is interesting to note that, in some regions both the cuisines are very similar and blended (like in Punjab & the north-
