The news and stories that matter, delivered weekday mornings. Twenty-two months ago, as the damage from Hurricane Sandy in New York City was still being tallied, President Barack Obama voiced his concern for those whose properties had been wiped out by the storm. “One of the lessons from Sandy,” Obama told reporters at the time, “is that we can’t just count on the government to get things done for us.” As we enter the 11th anniversary of Sandy, the President has once again said he understands the importance of the recovery efforts in the city, as well as the affected towns and townships across the state. And he says he expects “a lot more” from the federal government in the coming months. The Morning Rundown Get a head start on the morning's top stories. This site is protected by recaptcha “We have a lot of states to help,” Obama said during an impromptu press conference outside the White House, which was organized by his Council on Community and Human Services. “New York City has got to continue to lead itself. But we’re going to be working with our state partners and the federal partners in the months ahead.” NBC News reported that New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo asked President Obama to declare New York a federal disaster area, which would allow the federal government to provide more assistance. On Monday, Cuomo said the request was still pending. “I want to thank the President. He’s willing to move the ball down the field,” Cuomo said in an interview with MSNBC, adding that he had begun to work with the White House and city officials to coordinate an aid effort that will include medical, transportation and security services. “But it

Designing of quaternary ammonium chlorides from cationic polymers. Non-nucleophilic compounds, such as salts, esters, or amides have been extensively used to modify the charges of cationic polymers. Here, we introduce a method to design quaternary ammonium chlorides by reacting cationic polymers containing amino groups (cationic polymer-amine) with amine-functionalized aliphatic diazonium salts. The resulting cationic polymers contain quaternary ammonium cationic salts as side chains by replacing the cationic imidazolium moieties (conventional cationic salt) by quaternary ammonium cationic salts, which can be later used as a co-catalyst to promote the polymerization of anion-containing monomers. The degree of substitution of the anion and the cationic moieties are significantly dependent on the concentration and the reaction time. The effects of the molecular weight, the thermal property, and the chemical structure of the cationic polymer-amine on the yield, the acid and thermal stability of the quaternary ammonium cationic salt are also investigated. The quaternary ammonium cationic salts are then incorporated into cationic polymers to investigate their formation behaviors. In addition, the prepared quaternary ammonium polymers exhibit interesting phase separation and self-healing properties, which may find potential applications in the fabrication of functional materials, such as electrode materials, coatings, and membranes. The effect of prior treatment with immunosuppressants on the development of non-alcoholic steatohepatitis in HIV-HCV co-infected patients. In HIV-HCV co-infection, treatment with protease inhibitors may cause a mild, reversible elevation of transaminases. This might increase the risk of non-alcoholic steatohepatitis (NASH) and its progression to advanced liver fibrosis. In a retrospective analysis, we compared the performance of a first-generation protease inhibitor (PIs) (n = 51) with a second
