hdclone professional portableThere has been much moaning from both sides of the harbour about the Greens' views on how to tackle the Greens' views on how to tackle climate change. Just this week, the Greens have been falling over themselves to try to show the world that what they have been saying about net zero emissions is scientifically-validated reality. The Greens are well known for prioritising their philosophy over the practicalities of actual climate change action. But now their supporters are even starting to ask the hard questions. Another dead horse: the Greens want Australia to move away from a reliance on coal-fired power. (ABC News: Nick Haggarty) "If the Greens are committed to zero emissions, why are they pushing for an increase in the use of coal?" Senator Nigel Scullion, the Leader of the Australian Conservatives, set his party straight on this yesterday, pointing out that despite the Greens' many claims to the contrary, they are still committed to increasing the amount of coal-fired energy Australia uses. That's because — as Senator Scullion pointed out — the Greens want the world's nations to keep burning coal, in the belief that the idea of keeping the world warm will somehow lead to world peace. As he rightly pointed out: "Look: we're all agreed on the importance of the fight against global warming, but the most economical way to do it is to switch from coal-fired power to gas-fired power, to expand renewable energy. "The Greens won't lead the way in this." Some of those supporting the Greens have been having their heads turned to fast by some of the rhetoric against coal. One of them has been former Greens leader Bob Brown, who has now been co-opted to the so-called #EndWar camp which opposes Australia's participation in any future coal-fired power projects in south-east Asia. Senator Bob Brown has endorsed the initiative, which was to be announced in Brunei last week. The question any thinking person has to ask, here, is why would Bob

Brown, who has been steadfastly opposed to coal-fired power in the past, suddenly want to throw all his support behind an idea that will have no impact on climate change, and in fact might even have an actual negative impact on the planet's energy options? It beggars belief that he should be championing the idea, of course, which is why 6d1f23a050
