The abundance of organic matter in the river bottom has a significant impact on the biodegradation of the sewage; on the contrary, the flow of the river causes a rapid removal of biodegradable matter, so that it affects the leachate coming from the sewers. The turbidity and odour of leachate significantly deteriorates its quality in the lagoons, with ecological and economic consequences.1 These phenomena have a non-negligible impact on the quality of water used for agriculture. The latter is highlighted by the non-satisfactory quality and quantity of the fertilizers, which are carried by the river. Finally, the increasing demand for the inland fishery services in the area leads to the opening of areas used to support the same kind of exploitation. This phenomenon has a negative impact on the health of the fish, which carry a very important public health benefit.2 In order to improve the quality and quantity of water resources in the area, Piedmont Region and the Ministry of Health and Social Assistance (MISS) have started a project to improve the quality of the River Magra, which is common for the province of Piedmont and for the city of Turin. The project, which was funded by the European Regional Development Fund, has a technological part and a social part: the technological part includes all the studies to evaluate the current state of the river and to identify the main causes of its deterioration and the appropriate solutions, which can be applied with small and medium investments. The social part is concerned with the removal of the sewage contained in the river, and with the improvement of the quality and quantity of the water used for the cultivation of vegetables and the fishery service. The impact on the quality of the water has been evaluated by means of physico-chemical analysis, visual assessment and monitoring of the fish population. In particular, the most important indicators and c6a93da74d
